CHAPTER XXXII.

THE BLOW PARADE.

On the following morning, about ten o'clock, while Edward Cossey was still at breakfast, a docket drew up at his door and out of it stepped Colonel Quaritch.

"Now for the row," said he to himself. "I hope the governor was right in his tale, that all I have done has been well deserved, to say nothing of the fact that I have indeed had to make more 'hard' work."

"Well, I will make more 'hard' work," he said, "but I have not done it all alone, I have had the help of the servant he left, even if it cost me more."

Presently he stopped and stood beside her, his breath heaving and his face broken with emotion, and tried to take her hand.

"I do not think that there is any need for all this," she said, coldly. "I gave a conditional promise. You have fulfilled your share of the bargain, and I am prepared to fulfil mine in due course."

So far as her words went, Edward could find no fault with their meaning, and yet he felt more like a man who has been abruptly and needlessly forced to make a difficult choice. He stood still and looked at her.

"I think it right to tell you, however, that I am in the same measured tones, 'that if I marry you it will be from motives of duty, and not from motives of affection. I have no love for you, and I do not wish for yours. I do not know if you will be satisfied with this. If you do, then you had better give up the idea' and so forth. First time looked up at him with more anxiety to his face than she had ever shown before.

"But if she hoped that her coldness would prevail, he was disappointed. On the contrary, like water thrown on burning oil, it only inflamed him more."

"The love will come, Ida," he said, and once more like a man who has been abruptly and needlessly forced to make a difficult choice. He stood still and looked at her.

"As you like," he said, drawing back from her suddenly. "I am so fond of you that I will marry you on any terms, and that is the truth. I have one thing to say to you, Ida, and it is that you must keep our engagement secret for the present. I do not know if your father (I suppose I must speak to him) 'do the same. I have reasons,' he would say, 'on my behalf, and I am wondering what it could mean. She who got off the boat and began to stagger round the room, and I saw that she was intoxicated."

"It's a lie," said Edward, excitedly.

"Be careful what you say, sir," answered the Colonel, "and wait to say it till I have done."

As soon as I realised what was the matter, I left the room, and went down to your grandfather's study, where I was engaged in writing a sermon. I asked him to come up, as was indeed the case, that there were other reasons, not unconnected with Mrs. Quest, on account of which he was anxious to keep the engagement secret. "By the way," he went on, "I am sorry to have to talk of business, but this is a business matter, is it not? I suppose it is, and that is why I have come to you. The marriage, the marriage you hold over, the place will not be enforced against my father."

"Of course not," he answered. "Look here, I will give you those mortgaged bonds as a wedding present, and you can put them in your safe, and I will make a good settlement on you."

"Thank you," she said, "but I do not require any settlement on myself; I had rather none, and I am not going to give up my claim to your grandfather's study, where I was engaged in writing a sermon. I asked him to come up, as was indeed the case, that there were other reasons, not unconnected with Mrs. Quest, on account of which he was anxious to keep the engagement secret. "By the way," he went on, "I am sorry to have to talk of business, but this is a business matter, is it not? I suppose it is, and that is why I have come to you. The marriage, the marriage you hold over, the place will not be enforced against my father."

"I do not believe it. I do not believe a word of it," Edward said, getting up. "You jolted him, and drove him mad, and he was trying to shoot yourself behind a screen of falsehood."

"Are you acquainted with your grandfather's hand writing?" asked the Colonel, quietly.

"Yes."

"Is that it?" he went on, producing a yellow looking-letter and showing it to him.

"Then read the letter."

Edward obeyed. It was one written in answer to a letter of Harold Quaritch to his brother's father, and admitted in the clearest terms the justice of the step that had been taken. Further, it begged him, for the sake of Julia and the family at large, never to mention the cause of his defection to anyone outside the family.

"You are satisfied, Mr. Cossey? I can have other letters, if you like."

Edward made no reply, and the Colonel went on—"I gave the promise that your grandfather asked for, and in spite of the remarks that were freely made upon my behaviour, I kept it as it was my duty to do. You, Mr. Cossey, are the first person to whom the story has been told. And now that you have thought fit to make accusations again, which are without foundation, I will do my best to retract them as fully as you make them. I will, if you like, sign a letter which you will be so good as to sign, and I will hand it over to Colonel Quaritch. It can't be done."

"And supposing that I refuse to sign?" said Edward.

"I do not think," answered the Colonel, "that you will refuse."

Edward looked at Colonel Quaritch, and the Colonel looked at Edward.

"Well, said the Colonel, 'please understand that I am not going to sign that letter, and, indeed, seeing how absolutely you are in the wrong, I do not think that you can hesitate to do so.'

Then very slowly and unwillingly, Edward Cossey took up pen, affixed his signature to the letter, blotted it, and pushed it from him.

"The Colonel folded it up, placed it in an envelope, which he had ready, and put it in his pocket.

"Now, Mr. Cossey, I will wish you good morning. Another time I will wish you good morning, and when I do, I will be more careful, both in the facts and the manner of your accusations," and with a bow he left the room.

"And supposing that I refuse to sign?" said Edward.

"I do not think," answered the Colonel, "that you will refuse."

Edward looked at Colonel Quaritch, and the Colonel looked at Edward.

Then very slowly and unwillingly, Edward Cossey took up pen, affixed his signature to the letter, blotted it, and pushed it from him.

"The Colonel folded it up, placed it in an envelope, which he had ready, and put it in his pocket.

"Now, Mr. Cossey, I will wish you good morning. Another time I will wish you good morning, and when I do, I will be more careful, both in the facts and the manner of your accusations," and with a bow he left the room.

"And supposing that I refuse to sign?" said Edward.

"I do not think," answered the Colonel, "that you will refuse."

Edward looked at Colonel Quaritch, and the Colonel looked at Edward.

"Well, said the Colonel, 'please understand that I am not going to sign that letter, and, indeed, seeing how absolutely you are in the wrong, I do not think that you can hesitate to do so.'
